East and Horn of Africa

OPERATIONAL HIGHLIGHTS

- UNHCR protected and assisted refugees and asylum-seekers, mainly from Somalia and Eritrea, in the subregion.
- The Office provided support and assistance to internally displaced persons (IDPs) in Somalia.
- In Kenya and Uganda, UNHCR contributed to the return and reintegration of IDPs.
- The Office maintained a high level of preparedness to respond to unforeseen refugee flows in the subregion.
- UNHCR supported the return of Sudanese refugees.

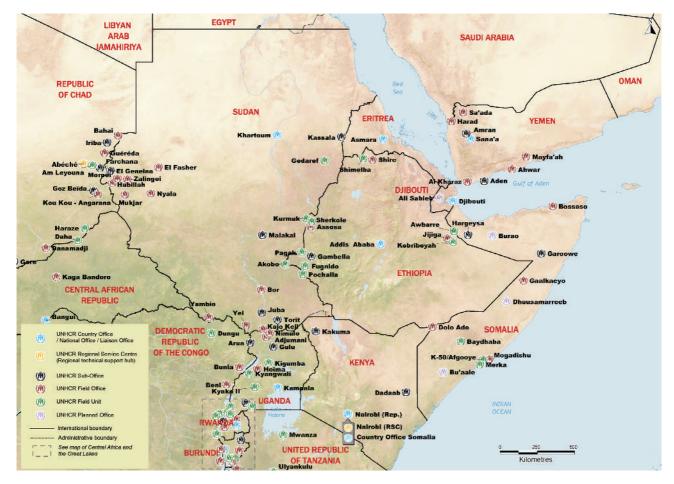

Working environment

The political crisis in Kenya, which in 2008 resulted in the internal displacement of some 665,000 people, largely subsided, although serious disagreements persisted among the main political actors. In Djibouti, Ethiopia and Uganda, stability allowed refugees and asylum-seekers to receive protection and assistance from UNHCR and other humanitarian agencies. The situation in south and central Somalia showed no signs of improvement, with continued fighting between the Transitional Federal Government (TFG) and the African Union mission on the one hand, and various armed factions on the other. The overall situation in "Puntland" and "Somaliland" remained stable. With some 117,000 people fleeing into neighbouring countries in 2009 and an estimated 1,500,000 persons internally displaced within it by the end of the year, Somalia continued to suffer one of the worst humanitarian crises in the world. The situation has also resulted in a continuous flow of asylum-seekers, mainly towards Eritrea and Ethiopia, with Somalis risking a dangerous journey towards western countries or the Middle East.

The region also experienced threats from Somali armed groups against humanitarian workers inside and outside Somalia as well as governments supporting the TFG. The result has had a negative effect on the perceptions of Somali refugees in the region.

Although the Ugandan Lords Resistance Army (LRA) shifted its activities towards other regions (the Central African Republic and the northern areas of the Democratic Republic of the Congo) its ability to destabilize the situation inside Uganda remained a concern.

Elsewhere in the subregion, many Sudanese were able to return and re-establish themselves in their country of origin. However, the absence of durable solutions for Somali refugees remained a major issue. Although Somali refugees were prioritized in resettlement programmes, the number of them resettled (some 17,000 in 2009) remained modest compared to the overall Somali refugee population.

Constraints

Insecurity generated by the unstable situation in Somalia had a negative impact on UNHCR operations in Somalia, on asylum countries, and on humanitarian space in general. In Somalia, the Office continued to use remote management techniques for activities in the south and central part of the country. NGOs have played a key role in efforts to provide protection and assistance to people of concern. In neighbouring countries, in response to continuous threats made by Somali armed groups, relief workers remained vigilant. The number of nations involved in the fight against piracy in the Gulf of Aden increased in 2009, affecting vessels carrying cargo for humanitarian operations.

Frequent floods and droughts in the region were also a challenge for protection and the delivery of assistance. Refugees in Kenya's Dadaab camps were particularly affected by climatic conditions. Inside Somalia, successive drought and floods also resulted in significant internal displacement.

Throughout 2009 the allocation of additional land to reduce congestion in the existing camps and to provide space for the arrival of some 55,000 new arrivals from Somalia was the subject of continuous discussions between the Government of Kenya and UNHCR. Towards the end of the year, there were positive signs that additional space would be allocated for a camp extension.

UNHCR devised a five-pronged strategy to deal with the large influx of Somalis. This consisted of improving the quality and delivery of services; enhancing environmental rehabilitation and management and thereby improving the livelihoods of refugee-hosting communities; strengthening the safety and security of refugees and humanitarian workers; relocating the newly arrived Somali refugees to Kakuma camp; and establishing an additional camp to host Somali refugees.

The repatriation of Sudanese refugees from Ethiopia, Kenya and Uganda was hampered by uncertainties in Southern Sudan.

Operations

Operations in Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia and Uganda are described in separate chapters.

Ensuring minimum standards of assistance in the provision of water remained a challenge throughout the region. While in the Dadaab camps access to water improved slightly, access to sufficient supplies of potable water in Djibouti and in Ethiopia proved to be difficult. Providing shelter in a number of countries hosting Somali refugees was also difficult. Given the scale of UNHCR's operations in the subregion, all assistance programmes increasingly took into account the needs of host populations, which often live in difficult circumstances.

The Government of Eritrea maintained its policy of recognizing those fleeing from Somalia and Sudan as prima facie refugees. Although the Government did not receive any asylum claims from Ethiopian nationals in 2009, it promised to provide them with protection, access to basic rights and safety from refoulement. Urban refugees, mainly from Ethiopia, faced serious challenges in finding income-generation opportunities. Potential employers failed to offer them jobs due to the fear of harassment by the authorities.

The Government did not allow refugees to be locally integrated in Eritrea. As most of the refugees are from south and central Somalia, where the situation is not conducive to voluntary return, resettlement appeared to be the only viable solution for many. The Government of Eritrea provided UNHCR with access to subsidized food. UNHCR supported the Government by enhancing its capacity through training. Despite the provision of enough basic food for refugees, the malnutrition rate among Somali children under five years of age in Emkulu camp remained high. In order to address this issue, UNHCR and the authorities undertook a campaign to educate Somali refugees on the benefits of breast-feeding and providing adequate food for the family.

The Nairobi-based Regional Support Hub provided technical advice and operational support to offices in the region in a wide range of areas. These included public health, epidemic and pandemic preparedness, nutrition and food security, supply management, shelter and physical planning, registration, HIV and AIDS, resettlement, refugee status determination (RSD), communications, finance, mapping, data analysis, women and children and staff welfare.

In Addis Ababa, UNHCR upgraded the existing Liaison Unit to a Representation to the African Union (AU) and the Economic Commission for Africa in January 2009. The Representation was established to reinforce the Office's strategic partnership with African regional organizations as part of UN system-wide efforts in support of the African Union.

The Office contributed technical and professional expertise to the preparations for the AU Special Summit on Refugees, IDPs and Returnees, which was held in Kampala in October 2009. It was also instrumental in mobilizing funds to organize this assembly of Heads of State and Governments. During the Summit, the AU Convention for the Protection and Assistance of IDPs in Africa was adopted.

Financial information

In 2009, UNHCR launched five supplementary programmes for it operations in the East and Horn of Africa. These comprised programmes for IDPs in Somalia and Somali refugees in neighbouring countries; IDPs in Uganda; IDPs in Kenya; activities for improving the living conditions in the congested Dadaab refugee camps; and a post-repatriation, rehabilitation and livelihoods project covering Ethiopia, Kenya and Uganda.
